

Visegrád

On a visit to the Palace of the renaissance King Matthias (1458-1490), an envoy of the pope, no stranger to pomp and glitter, once signed off a letter with the words, “From Visegrád, paradise on Earth”. With good reason, this was undoubtedly one of the most lavish royal seats of the day, a vast complex of 350 rooms, two stories and fountains carved from red marble. The upper castle was built between 1245 and 1255 and provided a venue for Central Europe's first “summit meeting” in 1335, at which the kings of Bohemia, Poland and Hungary signed their economic agreement. The reconstructed rooms of the castle not only contain some fascinating relics of the ages, the windows also open onto wonderful vistas of the spectacular Danube Bend.
